Your Chart and Carlos Castaneda

Explore awareness, energy, and the warrior's path through shamanic teachings and your chart.

Alice6, your chart describes a life organized around the question of how to carry intense perception without being carried away by it. Through a Castaneda-inspired, Toltec lens, astrology can serve as a map of tendencies in the energy body—not a verdict about fate, and not proof of a supernatural mechanism. The planets and houses describe where attention gathers, where personal power may leak into habitual reactions, and where disciplined awareness could make more of your energy available. The warrior's task is not to become invulnerable or to dominate others. It is to become less governed by automatic stories, to act with impeccability, and to recover attention from the places where it has become entangled.

The chart's defining image is Pluto in Sagittarius almost exactly conjunct your Sagittarius Ascendant, with both in the twelfth house area as described. The Ascendant is the threshold through which you meet life; Pluto intensifies whatever it touches. In this symbolic reading, you may enter a room sensing its undercurrents before you know what you have noticed. You can be drawn toward hidden motives, private histories, taboo subjects, and the moment when a comfortable explanation breaks open. Sagittarius wants a larger horizon, while Pluto insists that the horizon be earned through confrontation with what lies beneath it. This can make your presence compelling, but it can also make you feel that every encounter is charged with meaning or that you must uncover the secret behind every surface.

The warrior's discipline here is to notice intensity without mistaking it for command. Pluto on the Ascendant can make identity feel like a series of deaths and renewals: an old self-image becomes too narrow, and you are pressed to release it. "Erasing personal history" in this tradition need not mean denying real experience or abandoning accountability. It can mean loosening the reflex to introduce yourself through old injuries, achievements, family roles, or the story of what people have done to you. Your past matters, but it does not have to be the only lens through which your present energy is spent. The practice is not to pretend nothing happened; it is to stop rehearsing the same account as though repetition could finally make you safe.

Your Sun in Scorpio in the eleventh house and Mercury in Scorpio in the twelfth form a powerful bridge between group life and the hidden interior. The Sun in Scorpio seeks truth through depth, loyalty, and transformation. In the eleventh house, that search takes place among friends, collaborators, communities, and visions of a future larger than the individual. You may be especially alert to the unspoken agreements in a group: who has influence, who is excluded, and what people are afraid to name. Mercury in Scorpio in the twelfth adds a private, penetrating mind. You may think deeply before speaking, pick up emotional signals others overlook, or need solitude to understand what an experience has stirred in you.

The close Sun–Mercury conjunction makes perception and identity tightly linked. It can give you a talent for communicating what is submerged, but it also makes it easy to treat your interpretation as the whole truth. Scorpio's clarity is valuable; the warrior's caution is that clarity can become one of the four enemies of knowledge. The first enemy is fear: the mind sees danger and shrinks its world. The second is clarity: after discovering something true, a person can mistake that partial truth for mastery. Your chart asks you to keep investigating without becoming addicted to exposure, and to let your insight be tested by time, experience, and other people's perspectives. Stopping internal dialogue does not mean silencing intelligence. It means noticing when thought has turned from observation into repetitive argument, rehearsal, or suspicion, then returning attention to breath, bodily sensation, and the immediate task.

Your twelfth-house Mercury is particularly suited to quiet observation, dreamwork, journaling, and reflective practices that allow impressions to surface without forcing a conclusion. But the mind needs grounding. Mercury's sextile to Jupiter in Capricorn in the second house offers a practical channel: take a powerful intuition and ask what concrete evidence, action, or value it supports. Jupiter in Capricorn expands through patience, responsibility, and skill rather than grand promises. In the second house, it points to the importance of building self-trust through resources, craft, and values you can actually live by. Your personal power grows when your ideals become habits: keeping a promise to yourself, making a sustainable budget, practicing a skill, or choosing work that reflects your ethics.

The second house is especially charged, with Jupiter and Neptune in Capricorn and Uranus in Aquarius. This combination gives material life spiritual significance. Money, work, possessions, and self-worth are not trivial matters for you; they can become places where you test whether your ideals are embodied. Jupiter in Capricorn can build something lasting, while Neptune may blur boundaries around value, sacrifice, or what you believe you deserve. Uranus adds a need for independence and unconventional solutions. Together, these placements can produce alternating impulses: secure the future carefully, then break away from systems that feel constricting; believe in a dream, then question whether it can support you in real life. The chart does not say that you must choose either security or freedom. It asks you to make freedom more dependable and security less imprisoning.

One possible drain of personal power is confusing self-worth with usefulness, financial performance, or other people's approval. Another is allowing an inspiring vision to substitute for practical boundaries. Neptune in the second house can make generosity beautiful, but it can also tempt you to give away time, money, or labor without a clear agreement. Uranus suggests that your values may change as you awaken to new possibilities. Let them change consciously. The path is to examine what you actually value, rather than inherit a definition of success or react against one simply because it was imposed on you.

Your Venus in Libra in the tenth house is conjunct the North Node, drawing your growth toward public contribution through cooperation, proportion, and relational skill. Venus in Libra is attentive to fairness and the aesthetics of exchange; in the tenth house, those qualities can become visible in your work or public role. This does not mean your purpose is merely to be agreeable. It means you are learning how to bring people into more balanced forms of collaboration without disappearing into the role of peacemaker. The North Node describes a direction of development in this symbolic framework, and its conjunction with Venus emphasizes the power of diplomacy, beauty, mediation, and thoughtful partnership when these are practiced with integrity.

The opposite pull is Saturn retrograde in Aries in the fourth house, opposite Venus and the North Node. Saturn in Aries can describe a guarded relationship with initiative: the feeling that asserting yourself may provoke conflict, or that you must prove your right to act before you can begin. In the fourth house, those lessons may have roots in family atmosphere, early emotional conditions, or the private foundations from which you operate. Retrograde Saturn suggests that much of the work happens internally. You may carry an inner authority figure that is harder on you than anyone around you. Venus opposite Saturn can make closeness, recognition, and belonging feel earned rather than freely received. You might want connection and simultaneously brace for disappointment or judgment.

Saturn is not simply an obstacle. Its trine to Pluto and to the Ascendant offers unusual capacity to endure change and build a stable inner foundation. The task is to turn self-control into self-command, rather than self-punishment. An impeccably chosen “no” can conserve power; a carefully chosen “yes” can establish a life. The opposition to your Libra North Node asks you to bring your private courage into public relationships. You are not asked to abandon your roots or reject your need for solitude. You are asked to avoid letting old defenses make every partnership a test of whether you will be controlled, rejected, or required to perform.

The Moon in Leo in the ninth house brings warmth, creative feeling, and a hunger for a meaningful horizon. You need more than routine; you need a sense that life opens into learning, travel, philosophy, teaching, art, or some form of enlarged perspective. The Moon’s closeness to Mars in Virgo across the Leo–Virgo boundary links emotional conviction with action and analysis. Your feelings may become energetic when a principle matters, and you may respond to uncertainty by studying, correcting, organizing, or making a plan. This is a gift when it helps you serve what you believe in. It becomes costly when every disagreement turns into a mission to prove the right answer, or when perfectionism disguises anxiety as helpfulness.

Mars in Virgo in the ninth house squares your Ascendant and Pluto. This is one of the chart’s more volatile configurations: the drive to refine, correct, and pursue truth can collide with your intense presence and desire to get to the root of things. You can have the courage to challenge a belief, institution, or authority, but you may also meet resistance when your delivery feels sharper than you intend. In Toltec-inspired language, stalking is the art of observing your own habitual strategies with precision. It does not mean manipulating other people. For you, it could mean noticing the moment when a useful question becomes a prosecution, or when the wish to improve something becomes a way to manage discomfort. Before acting, ask: Is this intervention necessary? Is it well-timed? Does it conserve energy and serve a real purpose?

Your Moon and Mars in the ninth house also suggest that the search for knowledge is emotionally charged. You may be drawn to systems that explain life, but no single system should become a new cage. The warrior learns from a path without turning it into a badge of superiority. That is especially relevant to the enemy of power: after fear and false certainty, power can tempt the seeker to believe they have become exceptional, entitled, or beyond ordinary responsibility. Your chart has the intensity to attract attention, but spiritual maturity is not measured by how forceful your presence feels. It is measured by how responsibly you use it.

The word “predator” or “flyer” belongs to a specific and contested part of Castaneda’s writings. Rather than treat it as a literal explanation for distress or as a claim about external beings, it can be used here as a metaphor for attention captured by compulsive patterns: comparison, outrage, anxious rehearsal, or the endless need to be seen as right. Your chart’s Scorpio–Pluto emphasis can become fascinated by hidden forces; its Leo Moon can want recognition; its Libra Venus can monitor whether relationships are fair; and its Virgo Mars can keep scanning for flaws. Together, these energies can feed a loop in which attention is spent tracking how others perceive you. The practical countermeasure is not fear of an invisible predator but deliberate reclamation of attention: feel your feet, breathe slowly, name the actual task, and choose where your awareness goes next.

Your Sagittarius Ascendant, with Ceres, Pallas, Vesta, and Eros also in Sagittarius in the first house, lends a strong appetite for movement, candor, and exploration. These points reinforce the chart’s theme of a self that grows through direct experience. Ceres brings a nurturing quality to the search: you may feed others through encouragement, learning, or helping them find perspective. Pallas adds strategic pattern recognition. Vesta gives devotion, and Eros brings animating desire. Yet devotion can become overidentification with a cause, and candor can become a habit of saying the truth without asking whether this is the moment to say it. The art is to let your fire illuminate rather than scorch. Sagittarian freedom becomes more powerful when it is paired with the Libra skill of listening and the Capricorn skill of follow-through.

Chiron in Libra in the eleventh house speaks to sensitivity around friendship, belonging, and equitable participation. You may have experienced, or may simply be especially alert to, the pain of not feeling fully included or of being valued for the role you perform rather than for your whole self. This can develop into a capacity to notice who has been left out and to help groups become more humane. But healing does not require you to repair every community or mediate every conflict. Your Sun in the eleventh already gives collective life importance; Chiron asks for discernment about which groups deserve your labor. You reclaim energy by choosing reciprocal alliances rather than trying to earn a place through constant emotional work.

The Midheaven in Virgo, supported by Jupiter in Capricorn’s trine, reinforces a vocation built through competence, service, and practical judgment. Publicly, you may be most effective when you make complex matters clearer or improve how something functions. This could be expressed in many kinds of work; the chart does not dictate a profession.

What matters is that your contribution has craft behind it. The Midheaven's relationship with the North Node–Venus conjunction suggests that your public path is not only about efficiency. It also asks you to create fairer, more graceful ways of working with others. Use discernment without turning it into fault-finding, and service without turning it into self-erasure.

Consider a first scenario. You join a creative or professional group with a meaningful project. At first, your Scorpio Sun notices the group's unspoken tensions, your Mercury in the twelfth silently maps them, and your Libra Venus wants a fair arrangement. Then someone makes a dismissive comment, and Mars in Virgo spots several flaws in the plan. Pluto on the Ascendant adds intensity; you feel an urge to confront the hidden issue immediately and expose the contradiction. In a less conscious moment, you might spend the evening rehearsing the argument, imagining everyone's motives, and deciding that the group's response will determine whether you belong. That is personal power leaking into prediction and self-protection. The warrior's alternative is to stalk the sequence: pause, notice your body's charge, separate what you observed from what you inferred, and ask one direct question. If the answer confirms a genuine problem, respond with a concrete proposal. If it does not, let the imagined conflict end. This does not make you passive. It makes your action more precise and leaves energy available for the work itself.

Consider another scenario around money and self-worth. You are offered an opportunity that sounds inspiring but has vague terms. Neptune in the second house may feel the promise; Uranus may relish its freedom from convention; Jupiter in Capricorn wants a durable result. Perhaps you are tempted to accept quickly because the project seems aligned with your ideals, or to undercharge because you want to be liked and included. Venus opposite Saturn may add a private fear that asking for fair compensation will jeopardize the relationship. Here, the chart's path is to make the invisible visible: clarify the scope, timeline, payment, and responsibilities before agreeing. That is not a failure of trust. It is an act of care for your energy. Your personal power grows when generosity is chosen rather than extracted and when a dream is given a structure capable of sustaining it.

“Death as an advisor” offers a useful perspective on both examples. This is not a call to morbidity; it is a way of remembering that time and attention are finite. Before spending a week in resentment, ask whether the matter deserves that much of your life. Before accepting a role that drains you, ask whether you would choose it if you remembered that your time cannot be replenished. Pluto on the Ascendant is already acquainted with endings and transformations. You can use that awareness to release what has become merely familiar, without dramatizing every change as a crisis. Death, as advisor, asks for sobriety: what is essential now, and what can be allowed to end?

The “old age” among the four enemies of knowledge can be understood as the weariness that comes when habits harden into a final identity: “I am always the one who has to fix it,” “I cannot trust anyone,” or “I missed my chance.” Your chart contains enough mutable and cardinal energy to resist that fatalism. Sagittarius seeks new territory, Virgo improves the method, Libra revises the terms of exchange, and Aries Saturn can learn the dignity of beginning. Even the feeling of being too tired to change can become an object of observation rather than an unquestioned command. Rest matters; so does refusing to turn temporary exhaustion into a permanent prophecy.

The chart’s spiritual promise is not that you will escape ordinary human needs. It is that your intensity can be trained into presence, your discernment into service, your independence into principled action, and your desire for meaning into lived practice. When internal dialogue grows loud, return to immediate sensation and the task in front of you. When clarity becomes certainty, make room for what you have not yet seen. When recognition becomes necessary, remember that your worth does not depend on an audience. When power arrives, use it to protect attention and support honest exchange rather than to control the outcome.

In this symbolic map, reclaiming your totality as a luminous being means gathering your energy back from old identities, imagined judgments, unspoken agreements, and causes you have taken on without consent. It means holding both Scorpio depth and Sagittarius openness, both Virgo precision and Libra reciprocity, both Capricorn steadiness and Aquarius freedom. You are not asked to choose between the hidden life and the public one: Mercury in the twelfth and Venus with the North Node in the tenth ask you to bring private insight into visible, balanced contribution. Your path is to see deeply, act carefully, and remain willing to revise yourself. The warrior’s freedom is not a perfect story about who you are. It is the growing capacity to meet each moment with less compulsion and more of your own attention intact.
