Your Chart and the Diamond Approach

Discover essence, self-inquiry, and inner truth through the Diamond Approach and your chart.

Alice6, your chart tells a story of a person drawn toward what lies beneath appearances, yet also called to bring that depth into relationship and public life. Sagittarius rising gives your way of meeting the world an exploratory, candid quality: you seek a horizon, a truth, or a wider meaning. But Pluto sits almost exactly on your Ascendant, making this more than a lighthearted search for possibility. Your presence may feel intense even when you are not trying to be; you notice undercurrents, shifts in power, and what people leave unsaid. The spiritual task is not to become less powerful or less perceptive. It is to discover the embodied Strength that does not need to dominate, conceal itself, or remain on guard.

In the Diamond Approach, an “essential hole” is not a defect or a diagnosis. It is a useful name for the felt absence of a quality of Being, often covered by a learned strategy. Astrology cannot establish what happened in your childhood, but it can point toward themes worth investigating with care. Pluto on the Ascendant, supported by Saturn in Aries trine Pluto, suggests a life in which intensity and self-protection may have become early organizing principles. Perhaps you learned to read a room quickly, anticipate reactions, or manage your impact. Perhaps adults or peers responded to your forcefulness with alarm, fascination, or attempts to control it. These possibilities are not conclusions; they are invitations to notice what your own memory and present experience reveal.

Pluto in the twelfth house, close to the Ascendant, makes the boundary between private depths and visible identity especially porous. You may sense more than you can readily explain, and at times may carry emotional material that feels larger than your personal story. The twelfth house can describe what is hidden, but it also offers retreat, contemplation, and contact with the unconstructed ground of experience. Pluto there can make inward work potent: when you allow yourself to feel what is actually present rather than quickly interpreting or containing it, buried vitality may emerge. Strength, in the Diamond Approach's language, is not hardness. It is living power, the capacity to be here in your body and meet reality without shrinking or overpowering it. Inquiry might begin with a simple question: "What am I protecting myself from right now, and what do I feel underneath the protection?" Stay curious; do not force an answer.

Your Sun in Scorpio in the eleventh house is another signature of depth, but its setting among groups, friendships, and shared ideals gives that depth a social purpose. You are not simply probing your own psyche in isolation. You may be drawn to communities organized around transformation, justice, shared inquiry, or a commitment to truths that ordinary conversation avoids. Sun in Scorpio seeks sincerity and emotional reality; the eleventh house asks how that search serves a wider circle. The challenge is to distinguish true belonging from a role you adopt in order to be indispensable, insightful, or trusted with other people's secrets. Your essential individuality is not earned by carrying the group's shadow. It is discovered as you participate without abandoning your own center.

Mercury in Scorpio in the twelfth house is closely connected by sign and degree to your Sun, though the two occupy different houses. Your mind is investigative, private, and often attentive to what has not yet been spoken. You may need silence before you know what you think. There can be a gift for listening beneath words, for sensing contradiction, or for finding language for difficult inner material. There can also be a tendency to keep thoughts sealed away until they feel perfectly safe, or to turn uncertainty into private analysis. The path toward Truth, the essential quality associated with clear seeing and sincerity, is not necessarily to disclose everything. It is to recognize when silence is spacious and when it is a defense against being known. Ask, "What do I know directly, and what am I inferring? What remains alive in me if I do not solve this immediately?"

The Sun and Mercury make supportive sextiles to Jupiter in Capricorn in the second house. This connection offers a practical vessel for psychological insight. You can give form to what you discover, build skills around it, and translate subtle understanding into work, resources, or steady choices. Jupiter in Capricorn grows through patience rather than grand promises. In the second house, it links confidence to developing a reliable relationship with your own capacities and values. This is fertile ground for the essential quality of Value: not the belief that you are worthwhile because you are competent, productive, or useful, but the deeper recognition that worth is intrinsic. The ego may attempt to secure value through accomplishment or financial control. Inquiry asks, “If I were not proving my usefulness, what would I feel about my worth?” The point is not to reject ambition or stability, but to let them express value rather than manufacture it.

Neptune in Capricorn and Uranus in Aquarius occupy the second-house territory of resources and self-worth. Their near conjunction across the sign boundary blends imagination, idealism, independence, and a desire to live by values that may differ from convention. This can support original ways of earning, creating, or defining security. At other times, it can bring uncertainty: ideals may be hard to price, or freedom may seem to require giving up dependable ground. Saturn in Aries in the fourth house forms a sextile to Uranus, suggesting that innovation need not mean chaos. A steady inner foundation can make room for experimentation. The spiritual inquiry here is not “Which value system should I adopt?” so much as “What feels genuinely important when I am not reacting to fear, imitation, or a need to be exceptional?” The answer may change as your experience deepens.

Saturn retrograde in Aries in the fourth house points toward a serious inner relationship with autonomy and safety. Aries wants to begin, assert, and act from immediate life force; Saturn asks for boundaries, responsibility, and earned confidence. In the private world of the fourth house, there may be a tension between wanting to rely on others and feeling that you must stand alone. You might have learned to contain anger, to grow up quickly, or to distrust a spontaneous impulse. Or you may have encountered strong expectations around who was allowed to take up space at home. These are possibilities to investigate, not a fixed account of your family history. Saturn’s trine to Pluto offers genuine resilience: the capacity to remain present with intense material and gradually build an inner home that does not depend on constant vigilance.

This placement also brings the essential quality of Will into focus. Will, in this tradition, is not forceful striving; it is the grounded capacity to remain, choose, and act without abandoning oneself. Saturn opposite the North Node in Libra in the tenth house makes the private foundation and public direction especially important. Part of your growth may involve moving from a solitary, self-protective definition of strength toward a more relational way of participating in the world. That does not mean sacrificing your independence. It means discovering that steadfastness can include asking for help, negotiating, and allowing another person’s perspective to affect you. Your will becomes more trustworthy when it is neither rebellion for its own sake nor compliance disguised as maturity.

The North Node in Libra in the tenth house is conjunct Venus in Libra, giving relationship, beauty, fairness, and collaboration unusual importance in your vocational and public development. Venus is strong in its own sign here. You may have a gift for mediation, aesthetic judgment, tact, and creating environments in which people can meet one another more gracefully. The tenth house asks that these capacities become visible in the world, not remain merely private inclinations. Your path may involve learning that harmony is not the same as avoiding conflict. Real Libra balance requires truthful contact with difference. The Venus–Saturn opposition can make this lesson tender: you may long for approval or connection while fearing that intimacy, visibility, or professional success will cost you freedom or expose you to judgment. The hole might be felt as “I must be pleasing to be accepted,” or, in the opposite direction, “I must refuse closeness before it can limit me.” Inquiry can reveal the deeper Merging Love beneath both strategies: a belonging that does not require self-erasure.

Chiron in Libra in the eleventh house adds sensitivity around friendship, inclusion, and one’s place within a community. You may be especially aware of unfairness or of subtle exclusions in groups, and that awareness can become a source of healing leadership. But it may also touch an old ache: being the one who adjusts, mediates, or watches from the edge while wondering whether your unedited self is welcome. The invitation is not to become perfectly agreeable or perfectly independent. It is to notice what happens inside when you disagree, need something, or let others see uncertainty. Compassion, the essential warmth that can meet pain without condemnation, may first need to be offered to the part of you that believes it must earn its place. Then your relational intelligence can serve genuine connection rather than social self-management.

The Moon in Leo in the ninth house seeks a generous, meaningful emotional life. You may feel nourished by learning, teaching, travel, philosophy, creative expression, or contact with people whose worlds enlarge your own. Leo’s warmth wants to radiate; the ninth house wants experience to mean something. The Moon’s close conjunction with Mars in Virgo spans the sign boundary, bringing feeling and action into close conversation. When inspired, you can be wholehearted and purposeful, with an instinct to put conviction into practice. Virgo adds discernment and craft: you may want to improve what you believe in, make ideas useful, and notice where a vision fails in its details. At times, however, emotional passion can become self-correction. You might feel compelled to justify enthusiasm with expertise or turn a vulnerable conviction into a project that must be perfected.

Mars in Virgo in the ninth house squares Pluto in Sagittarius and the Ascendant almost exactly. This is one of the chart’s most forceful growth signatures. It can give courage to confront hypocrisy, pursue demanding study, and act decisively when something feels profoundly wrong. It can also make disagreement feel like a test of survival or integrity. You may react to a challenge by intensifying your argument, sharpening your standards, or pushing through a limit before you have noticed that you are frightened or hurt. A helpful inquiry is, “What is the life energy in this anger trying to protect or affirm? Can I feel it in my body before deciding what it means?” The aim is not to extinguish Mars. Its clean expression is Strength and Will in action: precise, proportionate, and connected to what is truly needed.

Moon in Leo also brings the essential quality of Joy close to the surface. Joy here need not be constant cheerfulness or a performance of confidence. It can be the natural brightness that returns when you are genuinely interested, moved, or creatively engaged. If attention, affection, or permission to shine felt conditional in formative experiences, you might alternate between hiding your enthusiasm and making it larger so that it cannot be ignored. The Diamond Approach would invite you to feel the simple aliveness before judging it. What is it like to enjoy an idea without needing to prove its importance? What happens when you let yourself be moved without turning that feeling into a public identity? Such questions may reveal a lighter, more playful presence beneath the demand to be impressive or correct.

Your Sagittarius Ascendant and the first-house presence of Ceres, Pallas, Vesta, and Eros reinforce a visible appetite for exploration, meaning, and wholehearted engagement. These points do not override the major planetary patterns, but they add texture: you may care for others by encouraging their growth, recognize patterns quickly, devote yourself intensely to a pursuit, and meet life with a strong instinct for possibility. At their best, these qualities help your individuality emerge without being cut off from Being. They also ask for discernment. The desire to inspire can become pressure to stay upbeat; devotion can become overcommitment; confidence in a larger meaning can sometimes bypass grief or ambiguity. Personal Essence, sometimes described as the Pearl, is not a polished persona that performs wisdom. It is your distinct, ordinary humanity, integrated with deeper presence. It can be direct, funny, thoughtful, serious, or unsure without ceasing to belong.

Consider a first scenario. You are in a planning meeting for a project you care about. Someone makes a confident proposal that seems unfair to a quieter member of the group. Your Scorpio Mercury catches what is unsaid; your Libra Venus wants the room to become fairer; Mars in Virgo begins composing a precise rebuttal. Pluto on the Ascendant gives the moment an intensity that others may feel before you speak. You might either remain silent to preserve harmony, or make your case so forcefully that the conversation becomes a contest over who sees the truth. Open inquiry could begin in the pause before responding: “What am I feeling in my body? What do I actually know? Am I trying to protect someone, prove my own perception, or both?” If you stay with the answer, Compassion can soften the impulse without weakening it, Truth can make your words clear, and Will can help you act. You might then say, “I’m concerned this plan leaves out the person most affected. Can we hear their view before deciding?” The result is not guaranteed agreement; the inner shift is that you speak from contact rather than compulsion.

Consider a second scenario. You have worked hard toward a public opportunity, and an offer arrives that promises recognition but conflicts with your values or requires a level of self-promotion that feels uncomfortable. Jupiter in Capricorn in the second house asks what is sustainable; Venus and the North Node in the tenth feel the pull of visibility and relationship; Saturn in the fourth may raise a private fear that success will make you exposed or unsupported. Uranus and Neptune in the second can add a hope for an ideal livelihood alongside uncertainty about practical security. You might tell yourself either that you must accept to prove your worth or that refusing proves your independence. Inquiry opens a third possibility: “What do I value here, apart from how I will look? What fear appears when I imagine each choice? What would a grounded yes or no feel like?” In that investigation, Value is not the prize at the end of the decision. It is the quiet recognition that your worth is present before the offer, and remains present whether you accept it or decline.

Peace, the essential stillness beneath disturbance, may be especially important because your chart has so much drive and depth. Peace does not require you to become passive, agreeable, or detached. It can be sensed in the small space before reaction, where a powerful feeling is allowed without being made into an order. Your twelfth-house placements invite inwardness; your ninth-house Moon and Mars want action and meaning; your tenth-house Venus and Node draw you into the public field. The path is not to choose one side and suppress the others. It is to let quiet presence accompany engagement. You can investigate whether your need for solitude restores you or protects you from contact, and whether your commitment to action arises from clear care or from anxiety that you must fix everything.

Across the chart, the essential qualities appear less as rewards to acquire than as realities obscured by strategies. Strength may be covered by control or by the fear of being too much. Will may be covered by self-reliance that cannot receive support. Compassion may be covered by mediation that avoids your own hurt. Peace may be covered by constant analysis or purposeful activity. Joy may be covered by the demand to be impressive or useful. Value may be covered by achievement and resource anxiety. Truth may be covered either by guarded silence or by combative certainty. Personal Essence may be covered by a role as investigator, healer, visionary, or agreeable professional. Merging Love may be covered by the belief that closeness requires giving yourself away.

The practical movement of open-ended inquiry is modest and exacting. Choose a moment of activation, pause, and describe what is happening without trying to improve it: sensation, emotion, thought, impulse. Ask a real question rather than one that contains its desired answer. “What is here?” “What do I fear would happen if I did not do this?” “What does this feeling need me to know?" Let uncertainty remain long enough for another layer to appear. Your chart suggests that insight can arrive through deep listening and then become useful through patient, concrete action. It also suggests that realization is not apart from relationship, vocation, money, anger, pleasure, or the wish to belong. These are precisely the places where your strategies can become visible and where essential qualities can re-emerge—not as ideals you perform, but as direct experience.
