Your Chart and Anthony de Mello

Find awareness, inner freedom, and clarity through Anthony de Mello's teachings and your chart.

Alice6, your chart can be read as a map of where awareness is invited to enter—not as a verdict about who you are. In the spirit of Anthony de Mello, the point is not to improve a fixed personality until it becomes spiritually impressive. It is to notice the personality in motion: its fears, appetites, stories, and hopes. Astrology can help you recognize the patterns, but seeing a pattern is not the same as being trapped in it. The freedom begins when you can observe it without immediately calling it “me.”

One technical note matters for the interpretation. The supplied house labels place your Scorpio Sun in the eleventh house, but the listed house cusps place 12° Scorpio in the twelfth. The Sun and Mercury are close together in Scorpio, and both appear to fall in the twelfth by those cusps. I'll give priority to the cusps while keeping the eleventh-house themes of community and shared ideals in view. The chart's deeper story, either way, is a movement between belonging to others and discovering what remains when your identity is no longer organized around belonging.

Sagittarius rises, and Pluto sits almost exactly on your Ascendant, opposing the Descendant. This makes the doorway into life unusually intense. Sagittarius rising is often associated with candor, exploration, meaning, and an instinct to look beyond the immediate scene. Pluto there adds a searching, sometimes uncompromising quality: you may be drawn to what is hidden beneath appearances, and other people may experience your presence as powerful before you have intended to make an impression. Yet de Mello's teaching would invite a subtle distinction: the urge to seek truth can become another identity. "I am the one who sees deeply," "I am the truth-teller," or "I must uncover what is really going on" can be just as binding as a more conventional role.

Pluto on the Ascendant describes not a curse, but an invitation to watch how identity forms around intensity. When you feel compelled to control an outcome, expose a hidden motive, or remake yourself completely, pause and observe the sensation. What is there before the story? Perhaps fear, energy, grief, curiosity, or a tightening in the body. Those can be met directly without turning them into proof that you must act. Awareness does not require you to become passive. It allows action to arise from seeing rather than compulsion.

The opposition to Gemini on the Descendant brings this inquiry into relationship. You can be drawn to lively, intelligent, changeable people who offer new perspectives, while also feeling unsettled by ambiguity or divided attention. A partner's question or disagreement may seem to threaten the certainty you have worked hard to reach. But sometimes the discomfort is a doorway: can you listen without immediately preparing a counterargument, translating the other person into a familiar type, or needing them to confirm your self-image? In de Mello's language, attachment is not love. It is the demand that another person behave in a way that protects a picture you hold of yourself. Seeing that demand is not a reason to shame yourself; it is the beginning of choice.

Your Scorpio Sun and Mercury speak to a mind and will drawn toward what is emotionally true. Scorpio does not usually find comfort in superficial answers. You may sense what is unspoken, remember emotional details, and think privately and intensely before revealing what you have concluded. With Mercury close to the Sun, thought and identity can become tightly entwined: an interpretation may feel like a fact about who you are, and a private conclusion may harden into certainty before it has been tested. The twelfth-house emphasis suggested by the cusps deepens the inwardness. Much of your real work may happen outside public view, in the quiet places where memories, fears, and longings gather.

This is rich material for self-observation, but it can also feed rumination. The mind may revisit an old conversation as if enough analysis will finally guarantee safety. Here the practice is not to command yourself to stop thinking. Notice: "There is the mind revisiting the conversation. There is the hope that perfect understanding will prevent pain." That simple, nonjudgmental naming can loosen the identification. You are not required to believe every thought simply because it has arrived in your own voice.

The Sun and Mercury sextile Jupiter in Capricorn help bring depth into practical life. Your insight can become useful when you give it structure, patience, and a tangible form. You may be capable of turning private reflection into dependable work or offering grounded counsel to others. But even responsibility can become a spiritual disguise if it is used to earn worth. Ask whether you are acting from care or from the anxious belief that you must be indispensable. The difference may not be visible from the outside. It becomes clearer through honest observation of the inner demand.

Jupiter, Neptune, and Uranus emphasize the second house of resources and values, though the supplied cusp and house placements are not entirely uniform. Jupiter in Capricorn suggests a serious relationship with security, competence, and material responsibility. Neptune close to Uranus across Capricorn and Aquarius can complicate the meaning of security: you may both want dependable foundations and feel drawn to unusual, idealistic, or unconventional ways of defining value. Income, possessions, skills, and self-esteem can become charged with hopes of freedom or fears of dependence. The chart does not say that material life is spiritually inferior. It asks whether you can use resources without asking them to tell you that you are safe, admirable, or finally complete.

De Mello often pointed toward the difference between pleasure and happiness. Pleasure is a welcome experience: the praise, purchase, achievement, or pleasant certainty that makes the moment feel good. Happiness, in this sense, is not dependent on arranging every moment to suit you. If a success delights you, enjoy it. The attachment appears when delight becomes a condition: “I can be at peace only if this continues,” or “If I lose this, I lose my worth.” Your Capricorn and Aquarius second-house signatures make this a particularly practical question. Can you build security while remaining awake to the fact that no amount of security can be made into a permanent guarantee against change?

Your Moon in Leo in the ninth house needs warmth, meaning, and a felt connection to a larger horizon. It can give generosity, a dramatic emotional imagination, and a desire to live by convictions rather than drift. Mars in Virgo is also in the ninth by the supplied placements, and their conjunction across the Leo–Virgo boundary links feeling with action, conviction with critique. You may be moved to defend a belief, teach what you have learned, or correct what seems careless or unjust. The gift is passionate discernment. The trap is confusing a cherished worldview with truth itself, or using correction to quiet the uncertainty of not knowing.

Mars squares your Sagittarius Ascendant and Pluto, intensifying this pattern. When you feel challenged, the response may arrive quickly: explain, persuade, improve, confront, or leave. At times, the body may mobilize before you have understood what is happening. This is exactly where de Mello’s invitation to awareness becomes concrete. Before deciding that another person is ignorant or that you must win the point, notice the heat, the breath, the impulse to interrupt. Do not condemn the reaction. Do not romanticize it as righteous passion. Observe it. In that interval, you may discover whether a response is needed and, if so, what kind.

Your chart offers a vivid everyday example. Imagine you are in a group planning a meaningful project. Someone proposes a vague idea, and you immediately see practical problems. Mars in Virgo wants to improve it; the Leo Moon wants the work to matter; Scorpio Mercury senses the unspoken motives; Sagittarius rising wants to speak frankly. You may end up correcting the plan sharply, then replaying the exchange later and wondering whether you were too forceful or whether everyone else simply failed to understand. Awareness would not require you to pretend the idea was sound. It would ask you to notice the entire sequence: the urge to rescue the project, the satisfaction of being right, the fear that the group will waste its potential, and the aftertaste of self-judgment. From that clearer seeing, you might offer one useful question instead of taking responsibility for the whole group's intelligence.

Venus in Libra in the tenth house, conjunct the North Node, points toward learning through fairness, cooperation, and public contribution. You may have a gift for finding the balanced phrase, noticing the needs of different people, or bringing grace to a professional setting. There is a strong pull toward becoming visible through relationship, artistry, mediation, or work that depends on trust. The North Node here does not mean you must pursue acclaim. It suggests that life repeatedly invites you to practice mutuality in the world rather than retreating into self-protection.

Venus opposite Saturn in Aries in the fourth house gives this invitation emotional weight. The wish to be liked or to maintain peace can meet an old, stern inner voice that says you must manage alone, prove yourself, or avoid depending on anyone. Saturn retrograde in the fourth may describe an inwardly carried sense of responsibility around home, family, or emotional safety. This is symbolic, not a factual claim about your family history. The relevant question is what you have learned to expect when you need comfort. Do you automatically minimize the need, or work to earn permission to have it? Can you let another person see you without turning their response into a measure of your entire worth?

Saturn's trine to Pluto and sextile to the Descendant can be a resource here. The same intensity that might otherwise harden into control can become steadiness and emotional courage. You can stay with difficult truths without making them into a dramatic identity. You can set boundaries without treating them as punishment. And you can commit to relationship without asking it to erase your inner uncertainty. Radical acceptance does not mean approving of harm or surrendering discernment. It means beginning with what is actually present rather than bargaining with reality: "This is what I feel; this is what happened; this is what I can and cannot do now.”

A second scenario might unfold in your public life. Suppose you receive an invitation to lead a project or take a visible role. Venus in Libra in the tenth may feel the pleasure of recognition and the desire to create something collaborative. The North Node’s symbolism encourages you to enter the exchange. Then Saturn opposite Venus may raise questions: What if you disappoint them? What if you become dependent on their approval? What if success makes home or private life feel less secure? Jupiter in Capricorn may respond by making a detailed plan, while Neptune may color the opportunity with an idealized image of what it could become. You do not need to dismiss the opportunity or obey its glamour. Observe the competing movements. What remains attractive when you remove the fantasy of universal approval? What concerns are practical, and what concerns are old predictions repeating themselves? That distinction can help you choose freely.

Chiron in Libra in the eleventh house brings sensitivity around friendship, acceptance, and your place in a wider community. You might be especially alert to exclusion or imbalance, and may try to repair a group’s discomfort by becoming agreeable, useful, or diplomatic. This tenderness can become compassion when it is no longer a demand to be needed by everyone. Your Scorpio emphasis wants bonds of real trust; the Libra emphasis wants mutuality; the eleventh-house themes raise the question of how to belong without surrendering your perceptions. Belonging is more nourishing when it does not require you to perform a permanent role.

The chart’s tension between private depth and public relationship is not a problem to solve once and for all. It is a setting for awakening. You may move from wanting to disappear into private analysis to wanting to explain yourself perfectly in public. Neither position is the true self. De Mello’s phrase “the programmed self” is useful here: the collection of learned reactions and roles that says, “I am the intense one,” “I am the competent one,” “I am the agreeable one,” or “I am the one who must be free.” These patterns may have helped you navigate life. They are not enemies, but they are not the whole of you. The observing awareness that notices them is not another role to perfect.

Sagittarius rising, with Ceres, Pallas, Vesta, and Eros also listed in Sagittarius in the first house, gives the chart a strong language of seeking, tending, insight, devotion, and desire. You may feel most alive when you are learning, traveling inward or outward, asking large questions, or helping others see a possibility. But seeking itself can become restless attachment: “When I find the right teaching, relationship, place, or calling, then I will be whole.” The Ascendant ruler, Jupiter in Capricorn, brings the seeker back to practice and embodied responsibility. It asks you to test ideas against lived experience. An insight is not freedom merely because it sounds liberating. Does it make you more present, more honest, and less governed by fear?

The invitation is not to abandon astrology, ambition, love, pleasure, conviction, or individuality. It is to see them clearly. Use the chart as you might use a mirror: not to criticize the face, and not to worship the reflection, but to notice what is there. When longing arises, observe longing. When jealousy, pride, anxiety, or tenderness appears, give it room to be seen without converting it into a permanent identity. “I am having the thought that I must be admired” is different from “I am vain and must fix myself.” “I feel afraid of depending on someone” is different from “I am incapable of intimacy.” The first descriptions open space; the second can become new forms of sleep.

A parable often associated with this kind of teaching concerns someone searching for lost keys under a streetlamp, not because the keys were lost there, but because the light was better. The mind naturally searches where its familiar explanations are brightest. Your chart suggests that you are capable of searching deeply, but depth alone does not guarantee awakening. Sometimes the most important truth is in the less convenient place: in a bodily feeling you would rather analyze, a simple need you would rather disguise, or a moment of quiet that offers no dramatic revelation. You need not force a breakthrough. You can simply notice where you are looking and why.

The freedom suggested by this spiritual lens is not a future prize hidden in the chart. It is the space already present when a thought is seen as a thought, an attachment as an attachment, and a role as a role. Your Scorpio placements invite honesty about what you hide; Pluto on the Ascendant asks you to see how intensity shapes identity; the Leo–Virgo Moon–Mars combination asks you to notice the urge to make meaning and correct what is imperfect; Venus and the North Node in Libra ask you to practice relationship without buying acceptance at the cost of truth; and Saturn in the fourth asks for patience with the places where emotional safety feels difficult. None of these placements takes freedom away. They show where you may forget it.

Awareness, then, is not a lofty achievement reserved for meditation or crisis. It can begin while you are composing a message, checking whether someone approved of your work, defending a belief, or making a decision about money. See the wish beneath the action, and see the fear beneath the wish. See it without contempt. This is not self-indulgence; it is the beginning of responsibility. From that clarity, you can still love intensely, speak directly, build something worthwhile, and care about belonging. You simply need not mistake any one of those experiences for the whole of who you are.
