Your Chart and Trungpa Rinpoche

Embrace spiritual warriorship, raw truth, and sacred outlook through Trungpa's teachings and your chart.

Alice6, read through a Shambhala-inspired lens, your chart describes a tension between intensity and openness: a deep instinct to see beneath appearances, and a path that asks you to meet ordinary life with friendliness rather than turn insight into armor. Astrology cannot determine your spiritual attainment or tell you what you must become. It can, however, offer a symbolic map of habits: the ways you may protect yourself from uncertainty, and the qualities that help you return to the immediacy of experience. In this map, your Sagittarius Ascendant, Pluto close to the Ascendant, and Scorpio emphasis give you an unusually strong appetite for truth. Your Libra Midheaven and North Node, meanwhile, point toward a way of engaging others that is not based on winning, withdrawing, or being indispensable, but on relationship, fairness, and mutual recognition.

The Shambhala idea of basic goodness is not a compliment bestowed on people who behave well. It is a ground of dignity and wakefulness that is present before success, failure, approval, or self-improvement. Your chart's challenge is not to manufacture this goodness through relentless self-analysis. It is to notice when your analysis, intensity, or ideals become a cocoon that keeps you from contact with what is happening now. Your chart may describe powerful instruments for seeing and acting. The warrior's task is to use them without making an identity out of being the one who sees more, feels more, or can withstand more.

With Sagittarius rising, your first movement toward life may be to search for meaning, possibility, and a larger horizon. You may come across as candid, exploratory, or animated by questions of belief and purpose. But Pluto almost exactly conjunct your Ascendant gives that outward openness a concentrated, watchful quality. You can sense power dynamics, concealed motives, and changes in the atmosphere. Others may experience you as compelling or difficult to read, even when you are trying to be straightforward. This combination can become a strategy of staying one step ahead: if you can understand the underlying truth, perhaps nothing can surprise or overpower you. Pluto in the twelfth house adds a private dimension to that strategy. Some of your strongest reactions may emerge before you can explain them, as if old fear or resolve were moving beneath conscious thought.

In the Shambhala vocabulary of the cocoon, habitual patterns are not proof that you are defective. They are ways of arranging experience so that it feels more manageable. Your Pluto–Ascendant signature may build a cocoon from vigilance, intensity, and the wish to know what is really going on. Sagittarius can add a story that freedom depends on finding the right philosophy or leaving behind whatever feels small. The invitation is not to give up discernment or curiosity. It is to see when the search for truth has become a defense against the vulnerability of not knowing. Presence begins when you can remain in the room, in the conversation, or in your own body without forcing the moment to yield a final interpretation.

Your Sun at 12° Scorpio in the eleventh house and Mercury at 14° Scorpio in the twelfth form a close conjunction that crosses a house cusp. The Sun's placement emphasizes friendships, communities, networks, and collective aims; Mercury's twelfth-house placement draws thought toward privacy, hidden motives, memory, and what is difficult to say aloud. Together, they suggest a mind that searches for the emotional truth beneath group stories. You may be drawn to intimate conversations about power, loyalty, grief, and transformation, even in settings that appear casual. You can be perceptive about what a group will not name. The risk is that you may quietly absorb its unspoken tensions or feel responsible for diagnosing what is wrong.

This is a place where the three lords of materialism, in the Shambhala teaching, offer a useful mirror. The lord of form seeks security through possessions and arrangements; the lord of speech seeks security through ideas, explanations, and the authority of a convincing story; the lord of mind seeks security through distraction and the avoidance of direct experience. These are not villains outside you. They are familiar ways of avoiding the groundlessness of being alive. Your Scorpio Mercury can be skilled at exposing the lord of speech in other people, while still constructing its own intricate explanation for why you must remain guarded. Pluto near the Ascendant may intensify the lord of mind's urge to scan for danger instead of simply feeling the sensations that are already present. Your Capricorn second-house emphasis—Jupiter at 13° and Neptune at 25°, with Uranus at 0° Aquarius near the sign boundary—makes questions of security, resources, values, and self-worth especially important. The cocoon may promise that enough competence, control, or financial stability will finally make you safe. Practical responsibility matters, but it cannot provide the total certainty the cocoon demands.

The Sun's sextile to Jupiter in Capricorn gives your depth a constructive outlet. You can turn insight into commitments, skills, or durable contributions rather than treating intensity as an end in itself. Mercury's sextile to Jupiter similarly supports the joining of investigation with practical judgment. Your ideas may be at their strongest when tested against the material world: a plan that can be carried out, a conversation that helps someone, an ethical choice that has consequences. Jupiter in Capricorn is not a promise of effortless abundance; it can indicate growth through patience and a sober appraisal of what is sustainable. Its trine to your Virgo Midheaven reinforces the value of craft, service, and work done carefully. The spiritual path here is not an escape from ordinary obligations. It is learning to meet them without confusing achievement with basic worth.

Your Moon at 26° Leo in the ninth house seeks warmth, meaning, and a generous field in which the heart can speak. It may be moved by teachers, art, faith, travel, or experiences that widen your sense of possibility. Lilith in Leo in the same house adds a refusal to make your convictions smaller merely to be palatable. Mars at 2° Virgo is also in the ninth house, but the Moon and Mars are not a close conjunction by degree: they share a house, bringing emotional meaning and active discernment into the same area of life. You may care passionately about what is true and then work hard to correct, refine, or defend it. This combination can support serious study and ethical action. It can also lead to the feeling that you must have the right view, or that a mistake in belief reveals a mistake in character.

Mars in Virgo squares the Sagittarius Ascendant and Pluto in Sagittarius, according to the aspects provided. That pattern puts friction between your wish to move freely and an impulse to inspect, improve, or control what seems unstable. You may criticize yourself for being too intense, too blunt, or not sufficiently prepared; then, under pressure, become more forceful in asserting your position. The warrior's path does not mean suppressing anger or polishing it into spiritual language. It means recognizing its energy, noticing what it is protecting, and choosing an action that does not simply reproduce the conflict. "Crazy wisdom" in this context should not be used to excuse impulsiveness, cruelty, or disregard for another person's boundaries. Its useful challenge is to interrupt the certainty of the ego's familiar performance and meet reality directly, with care and accountability.

Shamatha-vipashyana offers a grounded counterpoint to the chart's intensity. In shamatha, you practice settling attention, often with the breath as an anchor, and notice when the mind has wandered without punishing yourself for it. Vipashyana is clear seeing: observing how thoughts, feelings, and bodily sensations arise and change rather than immediately turning them into a verdict. For you, this can be particularly revealing when Scorpio's detective mind or Pluto's vigilance starts interpreting every silence as evidence. The practice is not to tell yourself that everything is fine. It is to distinguish what you actually know from what you fear, anticipate, or infer. That distinction can make your formidable perception more trustworthy.

A first scenario might unfold in a collaborative project or friendship circle. Someone says little in a meeting, and you sense a shift in the group's mood. Your Scorpio Sun and Mercury may quickly notice a withheld feeling; Pluto near the Ascendant may read the pause as a sign that something consequential is happening. Sagittarius rising may urge you to name the truth directly, while Virgo Mars begins assembling the evidence and considering how to fix the problem. The cocoon could take over in either of two forms: you quietly investigate everyone's motives, or you deliver an incisive interpretation that leaves little room for anyone else's account. A more present response would begin with a breath and a simple question: "I'm noticing some hesitation. Is there something we haven't addressed?" That does not deny your perception. It offers it without making your perception the final authority. Maitri—unconditional friendliness—means including yourself in this generosity too. You do not have to be perfectly accurate to deserve patience, and neither does the other person.

Your Venus at 7° Libra in the tenth house is conjunct the North Node at 7° Libra, a strong symbolic emphasis on the public and relational path. Venus in Libra is attentive to reciprocity, proportion, beauty, and the conditions that make cooperation possible. In the tenth house, these qualities can shape your vocation or public contribution: you may be drawn to roles where tact, mediation, design, justice, or the ability to connect people matters. The North Node here suggests growth through learning the art of relationship in visible, consequential settings. This is not a command to please or to erase your own judgment for the sake of harmony. Rather, it invites you to practice a form of leadership that does not depend on dominating the room.

Venus opposite Saturn in Aries in the fourth house makes this path more complex. Saturn retrograde in Aries can symbolize an inward struggle around self-assertion, anger, independence, and the permission to take up space. The fourth house locates the question in foundations: home, family, belonging, and private emotional life. You may have learned to protect yourself by being self-sufficient, or you may experience a tug-of-war between wanting closeness and fearing that it will limit you. In public, Venus wants fairness and mutuality; in private, Saturn may ask whether it is safe to need, depend, or reveal uncertainty. Because Saturn also opposes your North Node, the old reflex of self-protection can feel like the more responsible choice, even when it leaves you isolated. Saturn trine the Ascendant and Pluto, however, can give you endurance and the capacity to undertake difficult inner work. Its sextile to Uranus suggests you need not choose between a stable foundation and a more experimental life. You can build forms of security that allow freedom instead of demanding obedience.

Chiron in Libra in the eleventh house adds sensitivity around belonging, fairness, and the experience of being recognized in a group. You may be especially alert to exclusion or uneven power, and that sensitivity can become a source of empathy and skill in community. It can also tempt you to take responsibility for restoring harmony at your own expense. The North Node–Venus emphasis offers a way forward: not perfect agreement, but honest exchange. You can help build an enlightened society in miniature whenever you make room for difference without turning disagreement into banishment. In the Shambhala vision, enlightened society is not a flawless community populated by people who have transcended conflict. It is a society increasingly capable of responding to reality with dignity, awareness, and care. Your chart's social emphasis asks how those qualities become practical: in the way you share power, listen, repair harm, and make decisions.

A second scenario might arise in work or a close partnership. You are asked to take on a visible role that requires diplomacy, but a private concern has been left unspoken. Venus in Libra in the tenth can make you want to represent everyone fairly; Saturn in Aries in the fourth may warn you that if you express your own need, you will be judged as difficult or disloyal. You might agree too quickly, then feel resentment gathering beneath the polished response. Or you could swing to the opposite pole and refuse cooperation to prove that no one controls you. The warrior's way lies neither in automatic accommodation nor in defiant hardness. It might be saying, "I want to contribute, and I need us to clarify what is expected before I agree." This is modest, direct, and grounded. It lets the relationship encounter reality instead of asking your persona to preserve appearances.

The tender heart of sadness is another important part of your chart's spiritual possibility. This sadness is not a failure to stay positive. It is the softening that comes when you recognize that life is vulnerable, that people suffer, that love cannot be made entirely safe, and that impermanence is not a personal insult. Your Scorpio placements may know something of loss and transformation; your Leo Moon may want to answer difficulty with courage and warmth. The practice is to let feeling be felt without turning it into a dramatic identity or a reason to close down. Sometimes sadness is simply the heart registering what matters. Maitri makes room for it: friendliness toward the frightened, ambitious, grieving, or confused parts of yourself, without giving every impulse the authority to act.

Your Sagittarius first house, with Ceres, Pallas, Vesta, and Eros there, emphasizes an instinct to engage life actively and on your own terms. These points can be read as symbols of nourishment, strategy, devotion, and desire joined to the self's outward approach. They reinforce the chart's vividness and its need for meaningful movement. The risk is that every appetite or conviction becomes a quest, and every pause feels like confinement. Your practice may be to discover that alert presence is not stagnation. A cup of tea, a difficult apology, a carefully completed task, or attentive listening can be as real a meeting with the sacred as a dramatic journey. Pallas in Sagittarius can help you see patterns and possibilities; Vesta can focus your energy; Ceres asks what genuinely nourishes you. These strengths are most useful when they serve contact rather than an image of yourself as endlessly free, wise, or self-sufficient.

Uranus at the beginning of Aquarius and Neptune late in Capricorn are not an exact conjunction, though they are linked across the sign boundary by proximity and the chart's stated aspects. In the second house, their symbolism emphasizes changing ideals around value, security, and resources. You may be drawn toward unusual ways of earning, sharing, or defining what is worth having, while also carrying hopes that material arrangements will provide a deeper sense of belonging or purpose. Uranus in Aquarius sextiles Pluto and the Ascendant, suggesting capacity for experimentation and a readiness to question inherited definitions of security. Saturn's sextile to Uranus can help innovation take a workable form. The balance is to question convention without romanticizing instability, and to plan responsibly without treating predictability as the same thing as safety.

Taken as a whole, your chart does not ask you to become less perceptive or less intense. It asks you to bring those qualities into the open air of relationship and ordinary responsibility. Scorpio and Pluto give you courage to approach what others may avoid; Leo gives warmth and a wish to speak from the heart; Virgo gives care for precision; Sagittarius gives the impulse to keep a horizon open; Libra teaches that truth is not complete until it can meet another person. The cocoon is woven when any one of these becomes an absolute: suspicion instead of discernment, performance instead of warmth, correction instead of service, escape instead of freedom, or harmony instead of honesty.

Genuine fearlessness is not the absence of fear. It is the willingness to encounter fear without immediately obeying its instructions. For you, this may mean staying with uncertainty before declaring what someone's silence means, allowing a question to remain open, or expressing a need without first proving that you deserve to have it. Shamatha-vipashyana steadies attention; maitri keeps that steadiness from becoming cold observation; the tender heart of sadness reminds you why presence matters. Through these practices, the chart's powerful instincts can become less like a defense system and more like a way of serving life.

The sacred world is not somewhere beyond the complicated social, emotional, and material world described by your houses. It is discovered when you meet that world without reducing it to a threat, a performance, or a project to perfect. Your path toward it runs through community, work, livelihood, home, and the actual people who can surprise you. When you allow insight to remain curious, courage to remain gentle, and independence to coexist with reciprocity, your chart's intensity becomes a ground for wakefulness rather than a wall against experience.
